Good morning, dear teacher and classmates!

Today, I want to talk about a question that every young person may think about—Who am I? As we stand at the stage of college life, this question is no longer about simple labels. It's about understanding our place in growth, our role in the group, and our direction in the future. Let me share these thoughts with you.

First, I'm a learner in a new era of study. College is not just a place to memorize textbooks or get good grades. It's a space to develop a way of thinking—learning to listen to different ideas, because diverse views help us see problems more fully. It's about turning knowledge into ability: not just knowing "what" but understanding "why" and "how to use it." This kind of learning teaches us patience, because growth doesn't happen in one day. It lets us accept that confusion and slow progress are part of becoming a better learner.

Second, I'm a member of the college community who values connection. Clubs and group activities in college are not just for fun. They are platforms to learn teamwork and responsibility. In these groups, we learn to support each other when things are hard, not just celebrate when things go well. This sense of belonging is important—it reminds us that we are not alone in our journey. We grow together, and our small efforts together can make the community warmer and more energetic.

Third, I'm someone who is brave to step out of comfort zones. Many of us may have felt shy or afraid to try new things before college. But college is a chance to change—to take on challenges we once avoided. It's about realizing that imperfection is not failure; it's a step toward progress. Every time we try something new, even if it's not perfect, we become more confident. This bravery is not about being fearless, but about moving forward even when we feel nervous.

Fourth, I'm a person who cherishes the value of care. In the busy rhythm of college life, it's easy to focus only on our own tasks. But true growth also means caring about others—about the people who support us, and about those who need a little help. This care doesn't need big actions; it's in the willingness to listen, to offer support, and to keep in touch with the people who matter. It's a reminder that we are all part of a bigger circle of love and support.

Finally, I'm a dreamer who looks toward the future with purpose. Every one of us has a goal for after graduation—maybe to work in a field we love, or to help make the world a little better. These dreams are not just "wishes"; they are the reasons we study hard and keep going. We know the road to our dreams won't be easy—there may be setbacks and difficulties. But these hard moments will only make our dreams more meaningful, because they teach us to hold on to what we believe in.

So, who am I? I'm a learner growing with new thinking, a community member valuing connection, a brave person stepping forward, a caring soul cherishing relationships, and a dreamer chasing purpose. "Who I am" is not a fixed answer—it's a journey of becoming, shaped by every choice we make in college, and every step we take toward a better self.

Thank you for listening!
